Are you wondering if there is a limit to the number of times you can refresh a page in a day? Distill Web Monitor can monitor websites, news feeds or parts of web pages and receive notifications when something changes. The extension can come in handy for several reasons, be it that you are looking for price drops on your favorite products or want to receive stock alerts for instance. Allows the precise selection of what you want to monitor The extension allows you to add an entire website for monitoring with a click of a button. However, if you are interested in specific information, then the Visual Selector allows you to pick the exact part of a web page to track. According to the developer, the selection can be further refined via regular expressions, CSS or XPATH and automated with JavaScript. While the add-on can be used for simple tracking, it can be configured for advanced usage as well. Depending on your needs, the monitoring can be fine-tuned with filters so that you receive notifications for the data that really matter to you. The Compound Conditions feature allows you to pack multiple conditions together and set filters matching multiple types of data. Enables you to monitor locally or in the cloud You will be happy to learn that the add-on allows you to customize the tracking frequency and it can be configured to run locally or in the cloud. As far as the frequency is concerned, the app supports intervals between 5 seconds and 30 days, so it is suitable for all sorts of content. Whether you are doing the tracking locally or in the cloud depends on what you are actually monitoring. If it is a light website with hard-to-find information, then monitoring locally may be a good idea. The cloud tracking is more directed for companies as it sends 24x7 updates and can be run on the servers. A handy extension for anyone looking to monitor online content Regardless of whether you are looking for bargains, want to be informed about stocks or the evolution of COVID or simply want to keep a close on your competitors, Distill Web Monitor might be worth a try.
