This is just my personal opinion, but if I had to put up with Lightroom, I would use Photoshop instead, despite all the limitations. I really don't like to dictate how other people choose to use software, but I feel like some of Lightroom's limitations and issues have been due to pure ignorance, and not a deliberate design decision on Adobe's side. This is not about technical superiority. There are other powerful RAW conversion tools out there, like CaptureOne, Snapseed, and even in-camera RAW settings that have emerged over the years. But Photoshop just feels faster to me, even though it struggles when you shoot large amounts of large files. I recently wrote about Lightroom's marketing campaign, and many people agreed that it had a sleazy quality to it. I don't think the people who wrote that blog even used Adobe's own software. I believe that Lightroom has been very well-designed, but I also believe that it has been confused by what could easily be an unscrupulous Adobe staff member. The truth is much more nuanced than people think, but Adobe seems to have struggled to maintain neutrality, or to be totally honest. There is a reason that folks are using Photoshop for professional work. The program is great. Lightroom can use the same tools, but doesn't have the obvious advantages of Photoshop in terms of power, usefulness, and efficiency. I have used Adobe Lightroom since 5.0. It leaves me with a great impression. I usually have Adobe Lightroom digital cloning to create layers, while I imbed in Photoshop to do the editing. Also, when I'm hosing my video, I use Lightworks.

What It Does: The Spot Removal tool is great when you have a bright circle on top of a dark background, or a dark circle on top of a bright background.
