Have we reached the end of the last oil phase? (1/2) 1.- Regarding the data sources, I find interesting to read a book written in 1969, The Oil Crisis, by the Scottish economist, John Kenneth Galbraith, where he writes, "Economics never existed...in a separated world. It is continuously blended with every aspect of human behavior, from the most minute to the largest and most dramatic." And he also argued, "Economics is a social science. It cannot be separated from the other sciences. It should begin with the premise that man should control the economy to achieve his ends." Well, from those words, the Social Science Association has been born. 2.- I wonder if we have reached the end of the last oil phase? A few weeks ago, the writer, Michael Shellenberger, published his book, The End of Energy: The case for a 100% renewable future, in which he explains that we have reached a level that is technically possible to replace the entire current energy usage with renewable sources, such as wind, solar, geothermal, and so on. For example, he states that the world can create more energy than its current consumption using current technologies and available renewable resources with the aid of some new innovations. The idea is to remove ourselves from the current energy consumption of fossil fuels. In the book, he makes the case that the market is still not taking into account the cost of production as a key factor for the adoption of renewable energy. But, Shellenberger is optimistic that this gap will be quickly filled through advocacy efforts and the technological innovations that are currently underway, especially in China and India. A few years ago, the oil price reached the highest level ever, and the only reaction was to ask "what if?" Actually, the price of oil can reach the ceiling and keep going down, or it can drop to zero
