Figure 1.1: Adjustment Panel, showing the new Gradient panel. You previously had color sliders for controlling Gradient Fill and Gradient Lighting, which have moved to the Gradient panel. You can see the Luminance and Color tracks next to the mid-tones. You can also see the new Double Exposure option for adding more layers to the image. For those who don't have Photoshop, there's Audition. It's the new times, new features of the world. With this tool, now, you can do it all. Things like edit, and fix, fix, fix, and then add it all together. You can edit color, add and adjust bevel and feather, you can add fish eye and chromatic aberrations. It's like what one would do to a pencil sketch. You manipulate the points on the image. You can paint with a filter. Inversion is a little known feature in Photoshop Elements and Photoshop CS6. Go into the Adjust->Invert menu, and you'll be taken to this simple interface. You can adjust the bottom right of the image by adjusting the histogram. You can use the Quick Selection tool to expand selection to your desired areas. Hint: make sure you hold Ctrl while dragging the selection window with the tool. This is a long list, so I'm going to focus on the best practices here: It's important that you adjust your tone curve for images shot with flash. Flash images don't appear as dark as other types of images, and you want to bring that out. The best way to do this is through the Tone tab in the Adjust->Curves dialog box. Once you tone them where you want them, you can export an image to a JPG to retain the quality of the image. Another good practice would be to maintain the color profile of the camera you're using. I know that's a chunk of info, but it's important to have a digital photo editor that you know the camera you're using and it's color profiles, but if you don't, then you're going to lose some quality. You have a Save for Web box, which can be found on the File->Save dynamic web (background) dialog box. If you need to quickly access this box, you should click the little circle next to the save for web option.
